The history of every nation has distinctive features, but the notion that the United States has exhibited radical peculiarities that have made its experience categorically different from that of other modern or modernizing nations has encouraged an oversimplified and often idealized view of the American past.

George F. Fredrickson

Description

This class examines American history in international perspective. It is organized into fourteen weekly topics arranged chronologically. It has three aims. First, to enable students to comprehend the multiple spatial and temporal contexts of the U.S. past. Second, to encourage students to break out of parochial approaches to the past in order to comprehend the contemporary world. Third, to get students to think about the contrast between “real” history and “reel” history.

Requirements:

You are expected to attend lectures on Monday and Wednesday. You are expected to attend the film series on Friday. You will write a take-home mid-term exam. You will write a final take-home exam. These requirements are graded accordingly: 10%, 10%, 40%, 40%.
